Greetings! I'm Dong Jun Yoon, a passionate student currently pursuing a Bachelor's degree in Industrial Relations and Human Resource at the University of Toronto, with a minor in Statistics.

My academic journey has been driven by a deep-seated curiosity about the intricate dynamics of organizations and their workforce. With each course, I delve deeper into topics such as labor economics, employment law, organizational behavior, and strategic HR management, constantly seeking to broaden my understanding and expertise in this field.

My fascination with statistics stems from its vital role in informing decision-making processes within organizations. Through my minor in Statistics, I acquire valuable analytical skills and insights that complement my understanding of industrial relations and human resource management.

Beyond the classroom, I actively engage in various activities to enrich my learning experience. Whether it's participating in internships, conducting research projects, or attending workshops, I seize every opportunity to apply my knowledge and skills in real-world contexts.

I strongly believe in the power of collaboration and community. As an active member of campus life, I enjoy collaborating with peers, contributing to discussions, and taking part in extracurricular activities that align with my academic interests. Outside of academia, I am an avid reader, a music enthusiast, and a nature lover. I find solace in exploring new ideas, discovering diverse perspectives, and embracing the beauty of the world around me.
